Multilingualism is a better way to educating, learning, and assessment in countries with different languages. It helps allows students to interpret, discuss, and express ideas using familiar languages, leading to deeper comprehension. In this way, language becomes a resource rather than a barrier to learning.

Secondly, multilingualism promotes inclusion and supports students' confidence. When learners' home to build knowledge, empowers students, and improves educational outcomes. In South Africa, where students speak different languages, relying on only one language in education is both limiting and unfair. Therefore, multilingualism should be adopted to produce a more comprehensive and successful education system.

Firstly, multilingualism will help students understand academic content. Learners will be able to use languages that they know to process information more effectively. Traditional approaches often assume that one language, usually English, is sufficient for learning. However, article says that multilingual pupils gain more knowledge when they are permitted to use their full linguistic repertoire through practices such as translanguaging (Mbirimi-Hungwe, 2023: 1). This approach languages are not part of learning and teaching, they may not understand the content being taught. Studies indicate that students who are taught in unfamiliar languages often fail to engage and may become passive in the learning process (Viriri & Ndimande-Hlongwa, 2023: 7). In contrast, whenever different languages are recognized and used in teaching, students feel valued and included. This inclusive environment strengthens their confidence and encourages active participation, which is essential for academic success.

Furthermore, multilingualism improves educational outcomes, particularly in assessment. Using one language to teach or communicate can be very difficult to other students, as they might not understand it or they are not fluent in it so it becomes a problem. They may struggle to understand questions or express their answers clearly, even when they understand the content. Research highlights that using indigenous languages in assessment can improve fairness and allow students to prove their full capabilities (Viriri & Ndimande-Hlongwa, 2023: 1). Additionally, multilingual teaching strategies have been shown to improve literacy development and comprehension, as learners are able to connect new knowledge with their existing linguistic and cognitive resources (Carrim & Nkomo, 2023: 195).

In addition, having multiple languages in education will help students in becoming good communicators and creative thinkers. It will be very easy to pupils to evaluate ideas and make judgements on information that comes from different sources written with different languages. Consequently, they become capable of developing good cognition and becoming more flexible mentally. Research has demonstrated that learning in diverse languages leads to increased interest in the learning process (Mbirimi-Hungwe, 2023: 2). Therefore, the learners not only develop an excellent understanding of academic concepts but also obtain critical skills.

In conclusion, speaking multiple languages is a valuable and required method in countries like South Africa. It improve understanding, boost inclusion, and improves academic performance. Education systems that rely on a single dominant language risk disadvantaging many learners. Therefore, accepting multilingual methods of educating, getting knowledge, and assessment is necessary for producing a fair, comprehensive, and successful educational system.
